

Special Issue

Reflections on a Failed Interview

How a researcher can better understand a life story

NAKAYAMA, Akiko*

Abstract

Recently, a number of research articles using life stories have been published in the field of Teaching Japanese as a Foreign Language. Doing an interview doesn't necessarily mean you can write a life story. In this paper, I introduce one of my interview, which failed to understand what the participant said and was unable to write her life story. Then I discuss what caused this failure by making three points: (1) Simply doing an interview is not enough to completely understand what the participant said; (2) the model story I used was inadequate in fully understanding what she said; (3) the participant was unable to make coherent linear life story.

Keywords

life story, undergraduate international student, self narrative, master narrative, rapport

---

* Saga University

E-mail address: E-mail: anakayam@cc.saga-u.ac.jp